Oil over $100 by November?

U.S. sanctions on Iran's energy industry, when they come into effect in November, could potentially drive oil prices above $100 per barrel, according to an industry expert.

"The sanctions threat is real and less than two months in front of us, that will transform the market into much higher prices," Fereidun Fesharaki, founder and chairman of consultancy FACTS Global Energy, told CNBC's Akiko Fujita at the CLSA Investors' Forum in Hong Kong.

These sanctions coupled with the fact that global inventories have drawn down to border on critical levels pose a real risk of materially higher prices going into 2019 and beyond.

"The industry, for the last three years, has been chronically under investing and continues to do so at a rate of only 60 percent of cash flow being reinvested in the form of capex," explained energy expert Robert Raymond. "The last time that happened [was] in 2004 and '05 which precipitated a spike to $147 a barrel."

"There has never been a better time to invest in conventional oil plays in the coastal U.S.," said John Jurasin, Radiant's CEO. "Radiant has numerous programs in these areas that are step out's and re-completes from on going production and are relatively inexpensive to get into and are much lower risk than shale plays."
